

CORONA REPORTAGE

FABIENNE S. / BRÜGG

Five people stand in a circle and drink their evening beer. They try to keep the two meter distance.

The conversation is mainly about where they can sleep tonight, where there is a dry place and if someone knows where to get something to eat. Everything is closed, the usual bars, alley kitchens and emergency sleeping places anyway.

Suddenly the police comes, who have been roaming around for days and are looking for problems. They slowly approach the group of people and are ready for discussions.

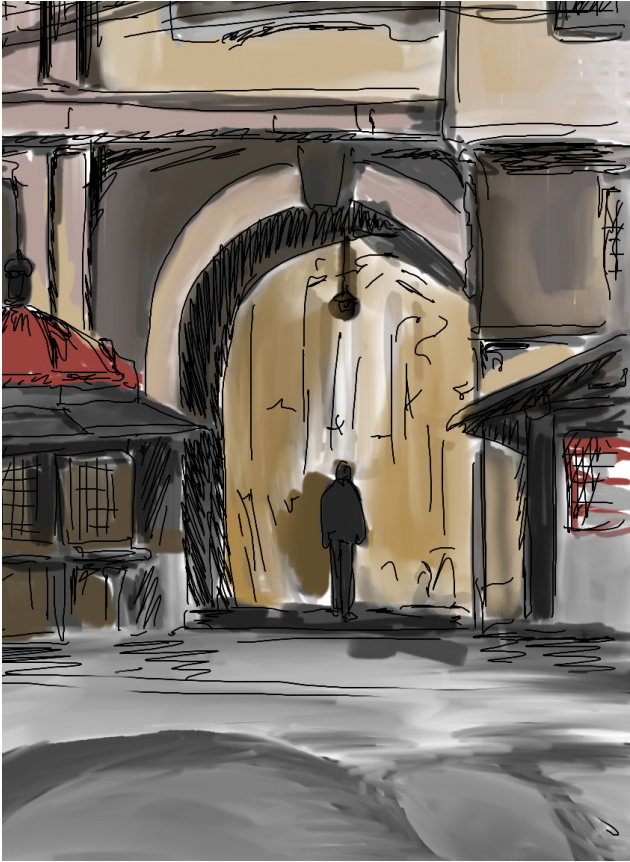

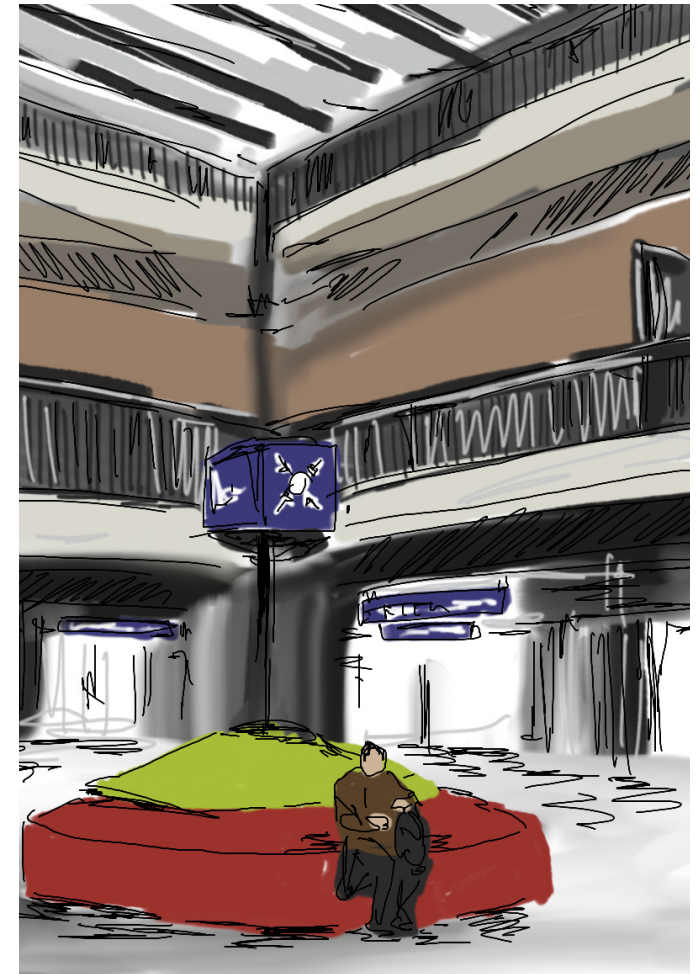

The group does not really want to get involved in discussions as it has been the same scene every evening until now.

They start pilgrimaging in different directions, packing their beer and blankets, if they have any.

This is to show that loneliness does not only mean to stay at home alone, but for many it means much more.

No roof over one's head, no one who cares about it, and not only being lonely but also destitute.
